5 TH INFANTRY DIVISION

DESCRIPTION

The insignia of the 5th Infantry Division is a red diamond. Worn as a shoulder patch on the uniform, this insignia is prized by officers and men alike. It is a great deal more than a patch of red felt. It is the outward symbol of a deep-rooted tradition.

The writer of the history of the 5th Infantry Division's part in the World War summed up this significance of the Red Diamond succinctly, as follows:

"The Red Diamond is the emblem of the Meuse Division. It is the diamond that cut into the battle line of the Vosges in August, 1918, and by the capture of the village of Frapelle made the only indentation suffered by the Germans in their southern sectors in three years of trench warfare. It is the diamond that helped shear off the salient of Saint Mihiel in the first great all-American operation of the war in September. It is the diamond that, after slowly grinding the Boche from out of the Bois des Rappes, became the point of an arrow that pierced the Meuse and thereby gave the 5th Infantry Division its name. It is the diamond that penetrated the territory east of the river Meuse to a depth of 18 kilometers before its drive was stopped by the Armistice of November 11."

HISTORY OF THE 5TH INFANTRY DIVISION

The history of the 5th Infantry Division covers but a very few years and its period of active service is even shorter, but its accomplishments on the battlefield, its esprit-de-corps and its traditions are equal to those of any division in the United States Army. Historical facts prove that the division has lived up to its motto—"We Will."

First organized and made active during the first World War period of four years, during which time the division established itself as a first class fighting unit, the 5th was only a paper unit from 1921 until its reactivation in 1939. But the spirit that created such a glorious World War record lived through those 18 years of inactivation and again today is placing the 5th Infantry Division among the front ranks of the Army.

Organized under a directive of the War Department in November, 1917, the actual formation of the 5th Division began on December 1, 1917, at Camp Logan, Texas. Absorbing many of the finest units of the Regular Army, the 5th soon blended these organizations into a smoothly functioning, willing and capable unit. Retaining their pride in their individual units, the members of the organizations that made up the new 5th Division soon joined hands in an equal pride in their new organization, establishing traditions and records which stamp the 5th as a division to be revered by its friends and feared by its enemies.

WORLD WAR SQUARE DIVISION

As a "square" division, the World War 5th differed noticeably in mobility and striking power from the present organization, but it set up an enviable record for the present unit to equal. As originally organized in the closing months of 1917, the division consisted of two brigades of infantry, a brigade of artillery and the usual units of divisional troops and trains. The Ninth Infantry Brigade included the 60th and 61st Infantry Regiments and the 14th Machine Gun Battalion, and the 10th Infantry Brigade included the Sixth and 11th Infantry Regiments and the 15th Machine Gun Battalion. The Artillery units were the 19th, 20th and 21st Field Artillery Regiments and the Fifth TM Battery. The Seventh Engineers were also part of the original division.

It is interesting to note that of the original components of the division, the following organizations have returned to its ranks today: the 11th Infantry, the 19th and 21st Field Artillery and the Seventh Engineers. Wearing the Red Diamond again, after more than 18 years of inactivation of the division, these units bring to the 5th Infantry Division of today the same spirit, traditions and reputation of the World War 5th. As was written recently in "A History of the 5th Infantry Division," the following paragraph points out that the 5th has always been present and awaiting orders since its first activation:

"Thus, though its actual period of activity has been short, the 5th Infantry Division never really passed out of existence, and the traditions which were beaten out beneath the artillery barrages of war-torn France are just as imperative today as ever. While the Division was inactive these traditions lived on in the units which had fought under the Red Diamond insignia and, when the division was reactivated, enough of these original units returned to the fold to keep the chain unbroken."

TRAINING FOR OVERSEAS SERVICE

Training on this side for overseas service differed little from the training of today, as the problem before the commanding officers was to weld into a fighting, coordinated unit the many organizations which had entered the ranks of the 5th. But under the leadership of Major General Charles H. Muir and later Major General John E. McMahon, organization and training had progressed to such a point by late in February, 1918, that it was possible to dispatch the first advance detachments of the Infantry and Artillery brigades to France to arrange for billets and training areas and to attend combat schools which were being conducted by the French troops. The Seventh Engineers and the Seventh Engineer Train accompanied this advance party.

General McMahon, in order to supervise more closely the movement of his command, transferred his head-quarters to Camp Merritt, New Jersey, then to Le Havre in May, 1918. Although the division was not moved overseas as a unit, it was the eighth combat division to arrive in France and its members were among the first 200,000 combat troops to go overseas.

Despite its presence overseas, the training of the division was to continue both behind the lines and in a quiet sector. With veteran French officers and non-commissioned officers, acting as instructors, the 5th In-by small infantry units and occasional harrassing fire by artillery—an admirable spot for training but not the kind of action the Americans wanted.

FRONT LINE DUTY

June 11, 1918, is one of the most memorable dates in the history of the 5th Infantry Division, because on that date the division was placed at the disposal of the Commanding General, 21st French Division, and within 24 hours, the 5th sent its first elements into the front lines, suffered its first casualties and let the enemy feel the sharp points of the Red Diamond in action.

Trench raids, gas attacks, and artillery bombardments kept the troops on their toes, and on July 15th the 5th fantry Division personnel were instructed in all phases of trench warfare and in the handling of all types of arms.

Then, on May 21, 1918, training had progressed so satisfactorily that General McMahon issued his Field Order No. I, preparatory to the movement to the front. Even then, though, training continued, this time under the watchful eyes of officers of the 33rd French Army Corps, which was holding the extreme southern portion of the front in Upper Alsace and the Vosges Mountains. Attached to the French 70th Division, the Americans had to suppress their eagerness to "get at" the enemy, as the only activities in the sector behind which the 5th Infantry Division had established itself were patrolling and raiding Infantry Division relieved the French troops in the St. Die sector. Accomplished smoothly and without incident by July 19, this movement placed General McMahon's men under his control for the first time since moving up to the front and gave them a sector approximately 25 kilometers long to defend.

The 5th Infantry Division was in the fight now and the Red Diamond was on its way to a distinguished World War record. From this time until the Armistice, the 5th, except for brief stays in rest areas in the rear, was always on the move—forward.

To Company I, 11th Infantry, on July 23, went the honor of capturing the first actual prisoner in "No Man's Land." Between that date and the Armistice, the 5th Infantry Division was to take a total of 2,268 prisoners.

On August 17, 1918, following the return of the division artillery units late in July, the 5th participated in its first real engagement—an attack up the valley toward the town of St. Die. In this first charge on this front since 1915, the division captured all its objectives, including a strategically important hill and the village of Frapelle, but it paid for its victory with 137 casualties, including 27 killed, 69 wounded and 41 gassed.

Selected as one of the crack outfits of the A. E. F. for the first full-dress offensive under American command, in the St. Mihiel sector, the 5th Infantry Division was ordered on August 28 to an assembly area in the hills along the Moselle River, and on August 30, all units were in their new billeting areas. Assigned its zone of action and objectives on September 4, the troops, amid rain and mud, started a 50-kilometer march to the front that night.

Facing an enemy that was strongly established along a chain of hills which rose sharply 450 feet from the valley of the Meuse, the 5th was assigned a zone which was but two kilometers wide and was ordered to drive due north about eight kilometers to the famed Hindenburg Line.

ATTACK ON HINDENBURG LINE

The orders for the operation came down from Division Headquarters on September 9 and the artillery went into position on September 10 and 11. The infantry, which had left the Moselle area September 6, had reached its initial position on the morning of September 19. Troops of the 10th Brigade started moving into assault positions on the afternoon of September 11. A few hours later the artillery preparation started and the attack was launched at 5 a. m. the following morning.

Fully living up to its motto—"We Will"—the 5th Infantry division attained all assigned objectives, captured huge quantities of enemy materiel and large numbers of prisoners, writing one of the most valiant accomplishments of its history. The Distinguished Service Cross was awarded to five officers and 16 enlisted men of the division before it was relieved on September 16.

The high esteem in which the division was held is expressed in the following telegraphed message received from Major General Liggett, commanding the I Army Corps, on the evening of the first day of battle:

"Congratulate sincerely the 5th Division on its splendid achievement today and desire to express my pride and gratification in having such a splendid unit under my command."

Once again, though, the division paid for its victory, this time with 1,612 casualties, including 318 officers and men killed in action, 1,167 wounded and 127 gassed.

Sent to the rear for rest and replacements on September 17, the division changed its billeting area several times before returning to the front lines on October 11 under heavy artillery fire, relieving the 80th Division. It was now under the command of Major General Hanson E. Ely, who had succeeded General McMahon.

MEUSE-ARGONNE OFFENSIVE

Starting its part in the all-out offensive of the Meuse-Argonne, the 5th Infantry Division, on October 14, attacked with brigades abreast, sweeping through the Bois de la Pultiere October 15 and capturing the Bois des Rappes on October 21. It was relieved by the 90th Division on October 22 and moved to the vicinity of Montfaucon for rest and rehabilitation. The price of victory once again was high for the 5th Division in this 11-day offensive. It suffered 4,449 casualties, including 779 killed in action, 3,108 wounded and 562 gassed.

For the second phase of the Meuse-Argonne offensive, which started October 26 and lasted until the Armistice, the 5th Infantry Division returned to the front and by November 3 held positions along the Meuse River.

A crossing of the Meuse was vitally important if the advance was to continue and the enemy, well aware of the strategic necessities of the situation, had concentrated a tremendous fire power along the river and the Canal de l'Est, which ran parallel to the larger stream for some distance. Machine guns, mortars and onepounders covered virtually every square foot of the ground across which the troops of the 5th Infantry Division would have to advance.

When the order was issued that a crossing of the Meuse would have to be forced at all costs, the 5th Division once again answered through its motto—"We Will."

Following the choice of bridge sites by patrols of the Sixth and 60th Infantry Regiments, a footbridge was put across the Meuse on the night of November 2. Under cover of darkness November 3, Company G, Sixth Infantry, filtered across the footbridge to reinforce Company E, which had gone over before and was holding a position under the bank of the Canal de l'Est.

The troops worked down the canal a distance of 600 meters during the day, carrying bridge material, and that night footbridges were built across the canal, but the men who got across encountered heavy fire from the strongly held enemy positions. All day November 4, a small force of infantry held the canal bank while the enemy poured out its maximum fire in a futile effort to dislodge them. Just after dusk that day, Companies E and G, less two platoons, reached the eastern bank, wiped out the machine gun nests and established a bridgehead, gaining the first foothold across the Meuse.

The remainder of the Ninth Brigade followed and the entire 10th Brigade was across the river and canal and in position for further attack by daylight of November 5. A combat wagon of the 11th Infantry was the first American vehicle to cross the Meuse. Once the crossing had been forced, the division established bridgeheads for both its neighboring divisions and then pushed on across the heights from which the enemy had been driven, advancing 18 kilometers beyond the Meuse and taking nearly 200 square kilometers of territory before the Armistice brought a cessation of hostilities.

This outstanding accomplishment of the 5th Infantry Division not only meant the success of its operations in the great American offensive but it paved the way for the success of the divisions on its right and left. The casualty list—price of victory—was once again high, with 2,122 casualties, including 457 dead, 1,520 wounded and 145 gassed.

With the signing of the Armistice and cessation of hostilities, the 5th Infantry Division completed its first war record—one that was filled with glorious achievements and valiant deeds. It was a costly victory, though, for the Allied cause, and the 5th Division paid heavily with 9,299 casualties, including 1,362 killed in action, 329 died of wounds, 6,182 wounded, 1,110 gassed in action, 256 missing in action and 60 taken prisoners.

Serving in the Army of Occupation, as one of 10 divisions in the American Army chosen for this exacting duty, from November 27, 1918, to July 3, 1919, the 5th Infantry Division maintained a base in the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg.

CITATION BY GENERAL PERSHING

Praise for this achievement came from no less a person than General John J. Pershing, who wrote as follows in a letter to General Ely in April, 1919:

"The feat of arms . . . which marks especially the division's ability as a fighting unit, was the crossing of the Meuse River and the establishment of a bridgehead on the eastern bank. This operation was one of the most brilliant feats in the history of the American Army in France."

DEMOBILIZED OCTOBER 4, 1921

Beginning July 4 and continuing until the end of July, 1919, the 5th was en route back to the United States. Reassembling at Camps Merritt and Mills, the division was demobilized at these camps, and on October 4, 1921, the division became inactive.

Although 18 years of inactivity followed for the 5th Infantry Division, it still lived on in the hearts and memories of those who had served under its Red Diamond on the battlefields of France. With such a spirit that refused to die, it was only natural that the 5th Infantry Division should once again be called to the colors in time of an emergency.

Reactivated at Fort McClellan, Alabama, on October 16, 1939, the 5th Infantry Division, inspired by the reputation of its World War predecessor, immediately went about the task of upholding that reputation. Assuming command on October 24, 1939, as the first commander of the new 5th, Brigadier General Campbell B. Hodges directed the initial reorganization and activities of the division at Fort McClellan.

Following the transfer of division headquarters to Fort Benjamin Harrison, Indiana, on May 31, 1940, the division received a new commander, when Brigadier General Lloyd R. Fredendall took charge. He served until September 4, 1940, when Major General Joseph M. Cummins returned from the Panama Canal Department to assume command of the organization.

REACTIVATED AS TRIANGULAR DIVISION

With formation proceeding rapidly throughout the fall of 1939, the new 5th Infantry Division took the form of the "triangular" type of division in contrast to the "square" 5th Infantry Division of the World War period. In the new division were three regiments of infantry, two regiments of artillery and engineer, quartermaster and medical troops, plus the usual units of divisional troops.

DIVISION HEADQUARTERS AND MILITARY POLICE COMPANY

The Division Headquarters and Military Police Company was reactivated at Fort Sheridan October 2, 1939, joining the division at Fort McClellan on November 3, and moving to Fort Benjamin Harrison the following May.

FIFTH SIGNAL COMPANY

The Fifth Signal Company was assigned to the division at Fort Sheridan on October 2, 1939, arrived at Fort McClellan on November 3, and moved up to Fort Benjamin Harrison on May 31, 1940.

SECOND INFANTRY REGIMENT

The three infantry regiments assigned to the 5th Infantry Division on its reactivation were the Second, 10th and 11th. The Second, at that time divided between Fort Wayne, Michigan, Fort Brady, Michigan, and Fort Sheridan, Illinois, began to join the division at Fort McClellan on November 3, 1939, leaving one battalion at Fort Brady. The first infantry units at Fort Custer, Michigan, which was to become the division's new permanent station, were drawn from the Second Infantry.

10TH INFANTRY REGIMENT

The 10th Infantry, less two battalions, went from Fort Hayes, Ohio, to Fort McClellan on November 7, 1939, and the remaining two battalions went from Fort Thomas, Kentucky, to Fort McClellan three days later.

IITH INFANTRY REGIMENT

The 11th Infantry, less the Third Battalion, moved from Fort Benjamin Harrison to Fort McClellan on November 10, 1939, the remaining battalion coming south later that same month.

SEVENTH ENGINEER BATTALION

Activated on October 15, 1939, the famous Seventh Engineer Battalion arrived at Fort McClellan from Fort Logan, Colorado, November 4, 1939.

19TH AND 21ST FIELD ARTILLERIES

The division's artillery was reactivated in the fall of 1939. The 19th Field Artillery was reactivated as a 75-mm. gun regiment of three battalions at Fort Knox, Kentucky, on October 1, 1939. The 21st Field Artillery was activated as a 155-mm. howitzer regiment of two battalions at Fort Knox on October 6, 1939.

The 19th Field Artillery joined the rest of the division at Fort McClellan on January 25, 1939, and the 21st arrived there on February 10, 1940.

ARTILLERY BATTALIONS REDESIGNATED

The division artillery was reorganized into its present form on October 14, 1940. Headquarters Battery, 5th Division Artillery, was organized from the Headquarters and Headquarters Battery, First Battalion, 21st Field Artillery. The 21st was reorganized as a battalion with a headquarters battery, three firing batteries, a service battery and a 75-mm. antitank battery. The First Battalion, 19th Field Artillery, was redesignated the 19th Field Artillery Battalion, and the Third Battalion became the 46th Field Artillery Battalion, and the Third Battalion became the 50th Field Artillery Battalion.

FIFTH QUARTERMASTER BATTALION

The Fifth Quartermaster Battalion, coming from Fort Knox, arrived at Fort McClellan on November 4, 1939, and moved the following May with the rest of the division to Fort Benjamin Harrison.

FIFTH MEDICAL BATTALION

The Fifth Medical Battalion, redesignated from the Fourth Medical Battalion, July 1, 1940, was assigned to the 5th Infantry Division on October 20, 1939, but did not join the division until May 27, 1940.

FIFTH RECONNAISSANCE TROOP

The Fifth Reconnaissance Troop was activated in August, 1940, at Fort Benjamin Harrison, and brought to Fort Custer on November 7, 1940.

The newly organized division participated in maneuvers at Fort Benning, Georgia, in the spring of 1940, and later that year took part in maneuvers in the Sabine River area in Louisiana. Divisional units also participated in the Second Army maneuvers at Camp McCoy, Wisconsin, during the summer of 1940.

Following the maneuvers, the division was destined to move to a new permanent post—Fort Custer, Michigan, its present station. Following the transfer of the head-quarters of General Cummins to Fort Custer on December 12, 1940, the units of the division continued to arrive and the training program was continued.

With relatively small cadres of experienced troops and ever-increasing numbers of Selective Service men, the division faced a stiff and difficult training period, but the officers and men of the division answered once again with the motto—''We Will.''

The success of their efforts was commended in a communication from Lieutenant General Ben Lear, commanding general of the Second Army, to General Cummins, following a thorough inspection of the division at Fort Custer in the spring of 1941 by General Lear, who wrote:

"I want to congratulate you on the specially fine showing which your command has just made in the tests covering the 13 weeks of training under the Mobilization Training Program.

"The progress made by both officers and enlisted men is highly satisfactory and shows they are well prepared for instruction under the combined training program.

"I anticipate splendid things of your division."

MANEUVERS IN TENNESSEE

It was not long before the 5th Infantry Division lived up to the expectations held by General Lear, for on May 20, 1941, the division received its first opportunity to show what it could do. On that date, the division moved out of Fort Custer on a 600-mile march into Central Tennessee, where, from June 2 to June 28, it was engaged in maneuvers conducted by the Second Army. It was a real test for the 5,000 selectees in the division, but they proved the success of their training by functioning just as smoothly as the older members of the command before the simulated war came to a close. Both War Department observers and Second Army officers were high in their praise of the division.

Returning to Fort Custer just before July 4, the division at once entered a period of intensive training to put into practice the lessons learned in Tennessee.

MANEUVERS IN LOUISIANA

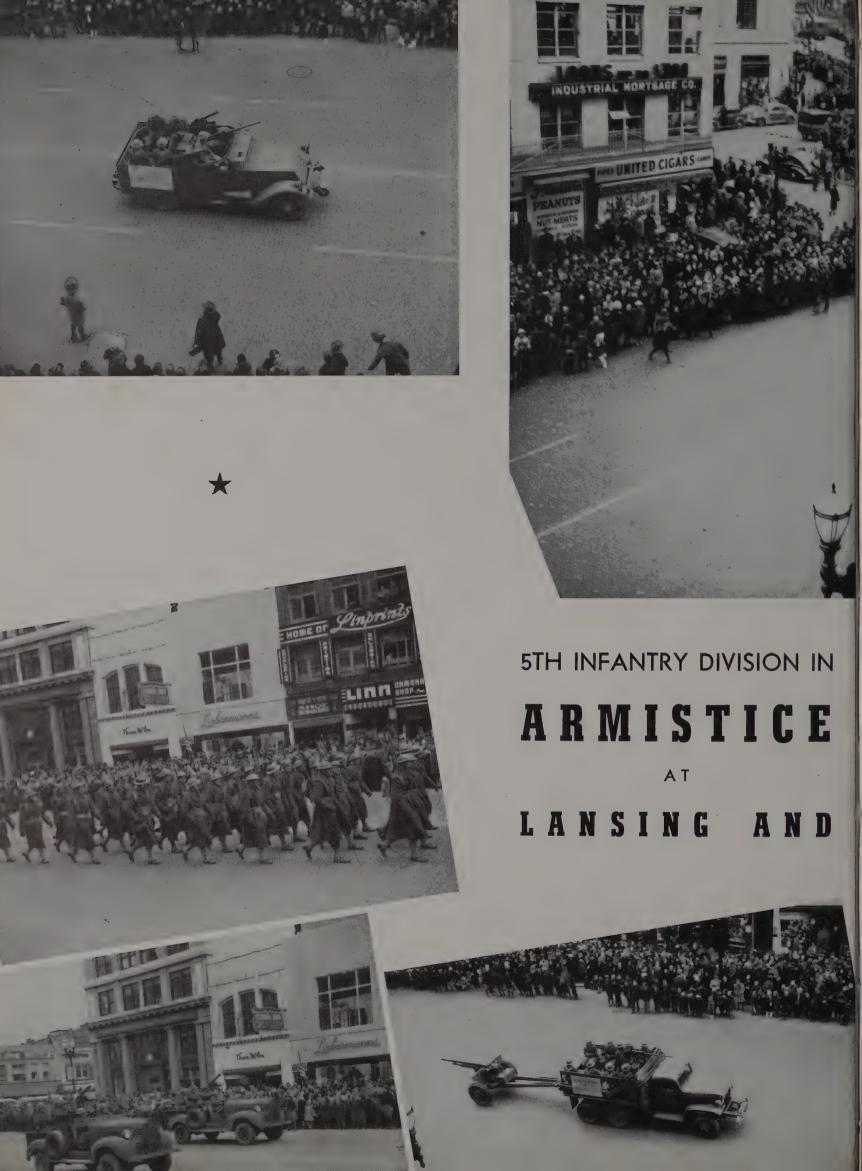

On July 24, 1941, Major General Charles H. Bonesteel, who had formerly commanded the Sixth Corps Area, assumed command of the division, relieving General Cummins, who, in turn, assumed General Bonesteel's command of Sixth Corps Area Headquarters at Chicago. Then immediately prior to its departure for the 1941 maneuvers in Louisiana, the division received another new commander, Brigadier General Cortlandt Parker, who had formerly commanded the 5th Division Artillery.

Benefiting from their previous maneuver experience and intensive training program, the officers and men of the 5th Infantry Division once again proved that they meant it when they said: "We Will." During these largest peace-time maneuvers in the history of the United States, the 5th was given a particularly difficult assignment. Assigned to a flank position, it had to cover a wide front extending 60 or 70 miles at times. That the division was given such a difficult assignment indicated the good opinion held in the Second Army of the 5th's capabilities. One of the outstanding feats of the division during the maneuvers was the capture of a whole regiment of Blue troops, some 2,000 officers and men, on their side of the Red River.

From the time it started its summer of maneuvers in May until its final return on October 7, the division covered 5,000 miles, moving at all times with maximum safety, efficiency and speed. This was just another outstanding accomplishment to add to the 5th's record.

The division is undergoing intensive training, and the entire personnel, as a unit, is determined that when called on for service, the 5th Infantry Division will be ready and willing to answer confidently: "We Will!"

A coordinated and effective army must have a means of getting and sending messages quickly and accurately. Switchboard operations, the laying of hundreds of miles of wires, air-to-ground radio, dropped messages, semaphore and such are each an integral part of the 5th's seemingly complicated but smoothly working system.

DESCRIPTION

This Regiment dates from 1808 when the old Sixth Infantry was formed, the Sixth being combined with the 16th, 22nd, 23rd and 32nd and renumbered the Second. (Since the date of approval of the above, the War Department has allowed credit to the Second Infantry for origin in 1791.) All those old Regiments except the 32nd took part in the Canadian campaigns of the War of 1812 shown by the lion crest.

Service in the Civil War is shown by the blue cross from the Confederate flag, and the red cross patee is the badge of the 18th Division, Fifth Corps, in which the Regiment served during the greater part of that war

INFANTRY STONES *

HISTORY OF THE SECOND INFANTRY

With more than 150 years of service and 84 battle participations to its credit, the Second Infantry is the second oldest infantry regiment in the United States. Since its first Indian campaign to the present, the Second Infantry has participated in numerous Indian wars, the Mexican War, the Civil War, the Spanish-American War and the Philippine Insurrection, and it was preparing to sail overseas for the World War when the Armistice was signed.

Its organization was authorized by an Act of Congress signed by the President on March 3, 1791, to combat Indian outrages in that part of the northwest territory which is now the State of Ohio. The place of organization was Fort Washington.

On August 1, 1791, the Second Infantry started from Fort Washington, on its first march and campaign, to the Wabash and Eel Rivers, to Tippecanoe, Ouaitenon (now Lafayette) and Logansport (Indiana), and returned on August 21, having journeyed a total distance of 450 miles in 21 days through bogs and dense forests, over rivers and surrounded by enemies. They killed a few Indians and destroyed some villages, but the results had no effect upon hostile conditions except to make the Indians more determined and to effect greater unity among the tribes.

The next clash with the Indians was to prove disastrous for the Army and can be listed as the Second Infantry's most crushing defeat. General St. Clair, who commanded the troops in this campaign, started his command north on September 17, 1791. Fort Hamilton was erected 25 miles north of Fort Washington and Fort Jefferson was erected 48 miles farther north.

Progressing under most adverse conditions and with their commander, the aged, infirm General St. Clair, suffering severely from the gout, the hungry, tired, sick force of men, after two months' effort, encamped on a branch of the Wabash, 50 miles from the headwaters of the Maumee, in the heart of the lands of the Miami. Little Turtle, the Miami chief, who was at the head of the Indian Confederation, on seeing the poor disposition of the Army, laid his plans for a daylight attack on November 4. With every man behind a tree, unseen and protected, the Indians opened fire with deadly accuracy upon a foe conveniently grouped and without shelter. The outcome was inevitable—the American forces were routed and of 1,400 men and 86 officers who went into the battle only 355 men and seven officers came out unscathed.

Despite this crushing defeat, the Second Infantry and the other troops of this command were to return to the battle-field and win the final victory over their Indian enemies. General Anthony Wayne, the next commander of the Army, accepted his appointment on condition that the troops would not be required to take the field until fully trained. Proceeding cautiously, he drilled his men for several months before advancing into the Ohio Valley.

He started this campaign on October 7, 1793. Ten days later, October 17, the Second Regiment (then designated as the Second Sub-Legion) participated in the battle which is commemorated by the second silver ring on the Regimental standard. Lieutenant John Lowry, Second Sub-Legion, and Ensign Samuel Boyd, First Sub-Legion, with about 90 men of the Second Sub-Legion, were escorting 20 wagons loaded with grain and stores to the winter headquarters of General Wayne at Fort Greenville, when the Indian chief, Little Turtle, at the head of a party of Indians, attacked them near Fort St. Clair. The Indians were superior in number and the battle was fought with great desperation on both sides. The Americans were totally routed, with the lost of 15 men, including both officers.

Following the establishment of Fort Recovery on the ground where St. Clair met his defeat in 1791, a strong force of approximately 1,500 Indians attacked the garrison of about 150 officers and men, but they were repulsed, having many of their warriors killed and wounded. This battle took place on June 30-July 1, 1794, and is commemorated by the third silver band on the Regimental standard.

INTO INDIAN COUNTRY

On July 28, 1794, General Wayne renewed his advance into the heart of the Indian country, but it was not until the morning of August 20 that he and his force moved out from Fort Deposit (erected near the present town of Waterville) to attack the Indians. Meeting the enemy on the banks of the Maumee, in the vicinity of the British fort and garrison at the foot of the Rapids, the American force, including the Second Regiment, won a decisive victory. This triumph and following "mopping up" activities of the American force resulted in the Treaty of Greenville, which was signed on August 3, 1795.

Following the treaty of 1794, British troops evacuated the southerly shores of the Great Lakes, and in 1796, the Second Infantry, with the First Infantry, took over and occupied Fort Lernault (now Fort Wayne), near Detroit, on July 12.

After approximately two years at Fort Lernault, the Second Infantry departed from the scenes of its earliest activities, to become identified with the pacification of the Indians of the South and of preserving the integrity of United States territory on its southern boundary, which was being threatened by the Spanish. The next few years were quiet ones, though, and the highlight of the period was the presence of four companies of the Second Infantry at New Orleans when the French government turned over the Louisiana territory to the United States.

In 1805, the headquarters of the Second Infantry arrived

On June 19, 1812, President Madison issued a proclamation declaring the United States at war with Great Britain and her dependencies.

During this war, the Second Infantry fought along the border at the battles of Chippewa and Lundy's Lane against the veterans of the Napoleonic wars, but one of their greatest accomplishments was the defense of Fort Bowyer near Mobile, Alabama, on September 15, 1814. In this siege, four British vessels and a force of more than 1,300 men were arrayed against a garrison of 130 Second Infantrymen. The wholly unexpected result of this battle was mortifying to the British, as the Americans easily beat off the ships and land force.

THE BATTLE OF NEW ORLEANS

In the early part of January, 1815, the famous Battle of New Orleans took place when less than 4,000 untrained, unorganized American troops under General Jackson faced some 8,000 highly trained British veterans. The final phase of the battle lasted less than half an hour, with Packenham and 2,600 of his officers and men killed or wounded. It is doubtful whether a British army had ever suffered such a decisive defeat at so little cost to the victor.

How many troops of the Second Infantry were present at the Battle of New Orleans is uncertain, but from all available records, it would appear that there were four companies present, and it is practically certain that there were at least two.

The British, turned away from New Orleans, marched to Fort Bowyer, which they bombarded on March 12 and quickly reduced to surrender, but it was not a great victory for the British, as the American force (part of the Second Infantry) was outnumbered 100 to one and the British armament was probably 1,000 times superior. This battle ended the war, as two days after the capitulation, news was received that the conflict was ended.

Following the war, the Regular Army was drastically reduced, and the enlisted personnel of the Sixth, 16th, 22nd, 23rd and 32nd was transferred to and became the enlisted strength of the Second Infantry. This occurred on May 17, 1815, under the Act of March 3, 1815.

Immediately after this reorganization was effected, the Regiment was moved north, the headquarters going to Sackett's Harbor and some few companies taking station at Plattsburgh. On August 1, 1816, construction of Madison Barracks was begun, most by troop labor of the Second Infantry. Five companies of the Regiment moved into the unfinished barracks on October 6, 1816. In January, 1822, the companies at Plattsburgh were removed to Sackett's Harbor. In June, Headquarters, with Companies A, B, D, I and K, embarked for Sault Ste. Marie, Michigan, where a post was established and named in honor of the Regimental Commander-Fort Brady.

The next few years produced little activity for the Regiment, with the troops moving from one post to another-Madison Barracks; Fort Howard, Green Bay, Wisconsin; Fort Mackinac; Fort Brady, Detroit; Houlton (Maine), where Hancock Barracks was erected, Fort Niagara, Fort Gratiot, Fort Dearborn. During all this time, though, the Regiment was never stationed at one place as a whole.

Following the organization of an army under General Scott for the subjugation of Black Hawk and the rémoval of all the Northwestern Indians, the entire Regiment was assembled at Rock River, in what is now the State of Illinois, in August, 1832. It left Fort Armstrong, near Rock Island, on September 23 and was reported later on the east branch of the River DuPage, as a part of the force of General Alexander, but not until the Black Hawk War had virtually ended. By that time Generals Posey and Alexander, in a three-hour battle, had routed, dispersed, killed or captured Black Hawk's Indians. In October, 1832, the Regiment returned from the Black Hawk War, being scattered and stationed at several of its former posts.

SEMINOLE WAR

When trouble broke out with the Seminole and Creek Indians in Florida, the companies of the Second Infantry, two and three at a time, began to move south until, by May, 1839, the entire Regiment was stationed in Florida. From that time on, it was actively engaged in the most arduous duty until the cessation of hostilities in the spring of 1842. It would be tedious to chronicle the stations of the Regiment—in fact, it could not be done—for they were on the move daily, fighting and building posts, forts and roads. Some idea, however, may be formed of the movements and the labors of the troops from that the fact that more than 90 forts and stockades and 480 miles of roads were built by the army in Florida.

This war, the Second Seminole War, was mainly one of skirmishes between small forces and nothing of a decisive nature took place until the battle of Palaklaklaha, near Okeehumphee Swamp, on April 19, 1842. This was really the last important incident of the war, although the troops remained in Florida on, as Tyler stated, "a service of the most disagreeable character.'

There being no further necessity for its retention in Florida, the Second Infantry embarked in May, 1843, on transports at Palatka and reached New York in early June, en route to its old stations along the lakes. There was probably no period in the history of the Regiment, up to that time, which was spent so pleasantly as that while stationed along the lakes in 1843-44. But the Regiment was soon to be ordered to face an enemy on foreign soil.

THE MEXICAN WAR

Following the declaration of war on Mexico and the subsequent American victories at the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, the Second Infantry began to move to the scene of conflict. Headquarters, Companies D. E. F. and K arrived at General Taylor's base of supplies at Camargo on the Rio Grande River on September 20, 1846. Companies A, B, G, H and I arrived at Camargo on October 13. The entire Regiment, except Company C which had been left at Mackinac for some unknown reason, was concentrated at Camargo.

The Second joined Twiggs' Brigade at Montemorelos on December 17, and, after a few delays, it proceeded to Victoria, arriving there on January 24, 1847, after several skirmishes with the enemy along the road. Following their designation as part of General Scott's expedition to Vera Cruz, the Regiment marched to Tampico, arriving February 25, 1847.

Beginning on March 22, 1847, the siege of Vera Cruz was the first major battle in which the Second Infantry participated in Mexico. During the entire siege, the Second Infantry was on the extreme left and had to carry and haul all impedimenta and rations over the sand hills and through intervening forests and chaparrel the whole length of the line, as no transportation had yet arrived from the depot at Brazos. From this time until the entry into Mexico, the Regiment did more than its share of the most arduous service. The Mexicans at Vera Cruz surrendered on March 29, a year and a day after the first appearance of American troops on the Rio Grande.

At the battle of Cerro Gordo, the Second Infantry distinguished itself, on April 17, 1847, by scaling a lofty hill as part of Twiggs' Division and inflicting a "fatal wound" on the Mexican Army from this position. Companies of the Second also played a gallant action in the battle which followed when the Americans attempted to cut off the retreat of the Mexicans. Overwhelmingly defeated all along the line, the Mexicans were dispersed and General Santa Anna, their chief, fled, first in a carriage, then astride a mule. The Mexican Army was not heard of again until the American Army was within a few miles of Mexico City.

On April 19, 1847, the Second Infantry entered Jalapa, remaining there until the end of May, when, in the advance, they set out for Puebla. Company C, which had been left at Mackinac, joined the Regiment at Puebla on July 7, 1847. It was not until August 7, though, that General Scott started the entire American Army on the march from Puebla toward Mexico City.

In the meantime, the Mexicans were busy strengthening the defenses of their capitol, to where General Santa Anna had marched the reassembled remnants of his army. The American march was made in the face of detachments of the Mexican Army, but no real resistance was offered.

As the force approached the City of Mexico, they were engaged in several important battles. The Second Infantry distinguished itself, time and again, as the Regiment, as a whole, or companies from its ranks, gallantly rushed the Mexicans. At Churubusco, Contreras and several smaller battles, the heroic deeds of Second Infantrymen were outstanding.

On the night following the terrible struggle of Churubusco, the Second Infantry bivouacked on the ground so dearly won and on the following morning it marched to Coyoacan, near the City of Mexico, where it remained during the armistice, which lasted until September 7.

Immediately following the termination of the Armistice, the Battle of Chapultepec took place. On September 13, a storming party, composed largely of members of the Second Infantry and led by Captain Casey, moved down the road towards Chapultepec at "double time." For 600 yards they were exposed to a raking fire from the castle. Despite their unfavorable position, the troops advanced and finally entered the Mexican barricade with a portion of the rifle regiment.

Entering the City of Mexico through several gates under terrific fire, the Americans forced the Mexican Army to retire from the city, and on November 14, General Scott declared the city in the possession of the American Army. Although the main Mexican forces had withdrawn, there was still work to be done, and the Second Infantry assisted in the street fighting and did its part in bringing the guerilla warfare to an end.

The Second Infantry remained in the city until December 17, when it marched out and became the garrison of Tacubaya, in compliance with the policy of extending the occupation of Mexico. Following the confirmation of a treaty between Mexican and American authorities, General Butler, who had succeeded General Scott as commander, issued an order on May 29, 1848, announcing the termination of the Mexican War and the speedy evacuation of the city.

The Second Infantry joined the Second Division and marched to Vera Cruz, leaving Tacubaya on March 27, 1848. It boarded the transport Sultana and proceeded by way of New Orleans and the Mississippi to Jefferson Barracks, Missouri, where it arrived in August, 1848.

Following Indian depredations in Oregon and the threat of similar occurrences in California, the Second Regiment, in September, 1848, proceeded to Fort Hamilton, New York Harbor, and in November, it was on transports sailing via Rio de Janeiro, Cape Horn and Valparaiso to the far West—California. The Second Infantry remained in that state until late in 1853, occupying stations from Goose Lake, Oregon, on the north, to Yuma, Arizona, on the south, and at the same time scouting over the entire country, as far as the eastern foothills of the Sierra Nevada Mountains.

During this period, they were stationed but a few months at a time in one place and all moves were made by marching, with the exception of a few trips by transports up and down the coast. Late in 1853, the Regiment was ordered east to New York, and after the return there, it was moved west to Carlisle Barracks and thence down the Ohio and up the Missouri Rivers to Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, at which place it arrived and took station in June and July, 1854.

From 1855 to 1861, the Second was occupied in the construction and reconstruction of forts, building roads, burning brick and lime, and in scouting over the hills and plains along the Missouri River and as far west as Forts Kearney and Laramie, and occupying stations at Fort Ridgely, Pierre, Fort Abercrombie, Fort Randall, Fort Miller and almost a score of others.

This was just the Iull before the storm, though, as Civil War threatened, and Captain Nathaniel Lyon and Company B, Second Infantry, were ordered from Fort Scott, Kansas, to the St. Louis arsenal early in February, 1861. He was placed in command of the troops and defenses there.

CIVIL WAR ACTION

On May 6, the Confederate Congress passed an act recognizing that a state of war existed, and on May 10, Captain Lyon and Company B, Second Infantry, captured Camp Jackson, St. Louis, Missouri, and its garrison consisting of a brigade of state militia, turned out by the Governor ostensibly for training. This was the first actual participation of the Second Infantry in the Civil War.

In the meantime, though, the Regiment had not been idle. While Company B was the first company to be engaged, the other units of the Second were being assembled from widely scattered western posts and were enroute to scenes of action.

To give a detailed account of the movements and engagements of the Second Infantry during the Civil War would necessitate a lengthy article, for which there is not space in this volume, but throughout the war, the Second Infantry served gallantly, courageously and victoriously.

After serving in Missouri and around the Potomac during the early months of the war and engaging the enemy in several battles, the Second Infantry participated in its first major operation of the war at the Battle of Gaines' Mills. The gallant action of the Regiment in this battle was put in writing some time later by Francis E. Lacey, who had served as First Sergeant, Company I, Second Infantry, in this engagement. His account follows:

"Bright and early on the morning of the 26th (June, 1862) camp was broken, everything packed up, and we moved to Mechanicsville to support McCall's Pennsylvanians, who were at that point. Early in the morning of the 27th, our line was formed in a sunken road near the old mill which gave the battle its Union name. A fatal blunder was made. All the entrenching tools were sent to the rear. We were here between three and four hours bfore the attack commenced, which was ample time to construct works that would have cost the enemy dearly to approach. About II o'clock the Confederate skirmishers came slowly and cautiously into view, followed by artillery. During this time, the infantry was taking position in a strip of timber immediately to our front. The first gun was fired by the rebels. A little later a shell from the enemy killed four of our men—three of Company C and one of Company F. A shell from one of our guns blew up a caisson in a Confederate battery just opposite us. The artillery duel lasted about half an hour. Soon after it ended the enemy's infantry came out of the woods to attack us. As they were forming a line the Second Infantry opened fire on them and sent them reeling to the timber. A fresh Regiment took their place and met the same fate. Two musicians of Company I, mere boys, went out under a heavy fire and brought in some wounded men. Their names were Robert Nelson and Bartley Scanlan. Another body of Confederates then came out of the timber. The Second sprang at them with cold steel and drove them back into the woods. Here Brinley (Captain, Second Infantry) was killed and Jordon (Second Lieutenant, Second Infantry) severely wounded, shot through the knees—two gallant officers—a great loss to the Regiment. The intrepid bearer of the National Colors, Sergeant Thomas Madigan of Company A, a veteran of the Mexican War, received a wound from which he died a few days later. The brave old fellow participated in every battle in which the Regiment was engaged in the war with Mexico. The next to take his place was Corporal Konsmiller, who was shot through the head and killed.

"We were now in a critical position—fighting in open ground with the foe in the woods. The storm of battle was now raging fast and furious along the whole line. The roar of musketry was deafening. It seems almost a miracle that an officer or man of the Regiment could live to tell the tale. The old Second never wavered but stood like an iron wall. It was now about four o'clock, p.m., when some volunteer troops were sent to relieve us. They received a volley from the enemy which completely broke them. They hastened from the field and we saw no more of them that day. The left wing of the Corps having been driven back a considerable distance, we fell back and formed in an old peach orchard. This position we held until sunset. Resistance now seemed to be in vain. Our ranks were fairly thinned, so we formed in line of battle with colors flying. We soon came to a bunch of timber and were halted there. The right wing did not hear the command to halt and continued its march through the woods. The reason for the halt was explained as a crippled battery left behind us. The enemy was near at hand. The old right wing was asked to save the battery and responded with a hearty cheer and at the same time dashed to the front, led by Lieutenant Parker, Second

Infantry, one of General Sykes' aides. The battery was passed. The wing halted within thirty yards of the advancing enemy, opened fire and brought them to a stand. Lieutenant Drum (Second Infantry) greatly distinguished himself here. The fearless Parker received a volley, swayed in his saddle and fell from his horse, dead. The guns were saved, but at what a cost. We lost more men in this last charge than at any time during the day. The remnant fell back and at dark was united with the left wing, and the battle at Gaines' Mills, after eight hours of hard fighting, was ended. We kept the enemy in check five hours against overwhelming odds, losing 138 men killed, wounded and

Thus ended the Second Regiment's participation in its first major engagement of the war, but the same fearlessness and fighting ability which characterized their action in this battle were to carry them through the remaining days of the conflict with glory. (The many major engagements, including the Battle of Gettysburg, where it helped to defeat the Confederate attack on the Union army's left flank, in which the Second participated during the war are listed elsewhere in this volume.)

Following the cessation of hostilities, the Second Infantry, in the fall of 1865, was ordered to Crittenden Barracks, Louisville, Kentucky, with the exception of Company H, which went to Jeffersonville, Indiana, just across the Ohio River. The Regiment remained in Kentucky, with the exception of a few temporary company stations in West Virginia, until April, 1869, when it was ordered to Georgia where it was to be injected into the terrible drama of "Reconstruction." It is to the credit of the Second Infantry that although some elements of the Army were in sympathy with the appalling conditions in the South at that time, that no such stigma rests upon the Second Infantry.

THE SECOND IN THE SOUTH

In accordance with the Act of Congress approved March 3, 1869, the army was reduced, and the enlisted personnel of the 16th Infantry was transferred to the Second Infantry. Two days after this transfer, the Regiment, with the exception of Company E, left Atlanta, Georgia, to take stations at Huntsville and Mobile, Alabama. In January, 1872, the Regiment was stationed in five southern states.

During its eight years in the South, the Second was constantly moving from point to point and their duty was most arduous and disagreeable.

When the Nez Perce Indians went on the warpath in the spring and summer of 1877, the regiment was ordered to Idaho and Washington Territory to take part in the campaign there. Upon arrival in the northern country, the Second was ordered to move north to the Mullen Pass of the Bitterroot Mountains and to prevent various small bands of northern Indians from joining the hostile Nez Perces. This effected by a peaceful "Potlatch" or "Pow Wow" with the natives at the Spokane Falls. As a precaution, though, 12 of the subchiefs were arrested and the Regiment marched to Lewiston, then to Fort Lapwai, and the campaign ended.

During the following winter, the Regiment was stationed at Fort Lapwai, Idaho Territory; Camp Howard, Mount Idaho, and Spokane Falls, Washington Territory.

In 1878, the Bannock Indians left their reservation and started depredations, and a portion of the Second Infantry was sent out early and remained in the field until late in the fall, aiding materially in bringing the Indians to terms.

In the summer of 1879, a campaign was made against the renegades of the Barrack, Shoshone and Weiser Indians, who had taken refuge in an almost inaccessible region in central Idaho. This uprising was successfully put down by fall.

After serving in Idaho, Washington and Oregon during the succeeding years, the Second Infantry moved to Fort Omaha, Nebraska, in 1886. In 1890-91, the Regiment participated in the Sioux campaign, which was the result of the Indians' "jumping the reservation" and committing depredations on the whites. The troops remained in the field during the winter and until the hostiles returned to their reservation.

THE SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR

In 1896, the Regiment left Fort Omaha and took stations at Fort Keogh, Montana; Fort Harrison, Montana, and Fort Yates, North Dakota. It left these stations about April 12, 1898, following the declaration of war on Spain, for camp in Chickamauga Park, where it arrived on April 26. After being sent to Rossville, Georgia, the Regiment went to Tampa, Florida, arriving there on May 14. After concentration at Tampa, the Second was assigned to the Second Brigade, with the 10th and 21st Infantry. The Regiment, travelling on three transports, arrived in Cuba off Santiago on June 20. Although authorized to increase its strength by four companies and become a three-battalion organization, the Second sailed for Cuba with only two battalions, the Third having not been organized.

The Second Infantry went ashore at Siboney early on the morning of June 24, 1898, and went into camp on the narrow sandy beach, remaining there until the 27th, except for a reconnaissance in torce along the railroad toward Morro Castle.

Its first major engagement in this war was at El Caney, where a brilliant and important victory was gained by the American forces. The Second was in the thick of the battle at San Juan Hill and the siege of Santiago. It participated in many other small skirmishes.

Following the capitulation of the Spanish forces, the Second remained in the trenches until August 19, when it was moved to a camp near the right flank of the Corps, where a large portion of the command soon succumbed to the tropical diseases which had begun to take its toll about July 5.

Finally ordered to an embarkation point, it went from Santiago to Guantanamo, by water, then sailed for the United States, arriving at Camp Wikoff, Montauk Point, New York, on August 15, 1899. Before closing the record of the Second in this war, though, it should be noted that Company I, organized at Tampa on May 31, 1898, but left behind, joined the Regiment in the trenches on July 14,

After remaining at Camp Wikoff for two months, the Second went to New York, then to Anniston, Alabama, arriving there September 23, 1899. The Regiment remained at Camp Shipp, Anniston, part of the winter.

In order to establish civil government in Cuba and insure that it was accomplished legally and peacefully, American troops were distributed throughout the island during the fall and winter. The Second, assigned to the Santa Clara department, arrived in Cuba in January, 1899, and took stations at Rowell Barracks at Cienfuegos, Sancti Spiritus, Sagua La Grande, Trinidad and Caibarien.

In September, 1899, the Second Battalion was returned to the United States to serve as a "home battalion." It took station at Fort Thomas, Kentucky.

PHILIPPINE INSURRECTION

With insurrection flaming forth in the Philippines once again, the Second Infantry was ordered to proceed there in July, 1899. After proceeding to Fort Thomas, Kentucky, to recruit and to refit, it remained there one month, then, leaving the First Battalion as the home battalion, it proceeded to the Philippines, arriving there in September. On April 1, 1902, the First Battalion left Fort Thomas and joined the Regiment in the Philippines.

This tour of foreign service was a most strenuous one, as the insurrectos took to inaccessible places, from where they emerged to make stealthy raids on the peaceful natives or to "shoot up" an American garrison at night. After the first few battles, this war involved garrisoning a great many towns which were the bases from which innumerable "hikes" were made, attempting to surprise and capture a phantom army, or, which was more important, capture their arms.

Detachments of the Second Infantry contacted and engaged the insurrectos at the following places, between October 15, 1900, and February 10, 1902: Naro, Catbalogan, San Cristobal, Uson, Lubang, Bampona, Boac, Catbalogan, Sion, Balachaquin, Mount Masalopet, Santa Cruz, Cagan, Yba Barrio, Duyay, Uson, Buena Vista, Duyay, Catubig River, Palaya, Estella, Buyacanai Barrio, San Bueno, Hingoso and San Narcisco.

It was not until May 7, 1903, after nearly four years in the tropics, that the Second Infantry embarked at Manila for return home. After arrival in San Francisco, Headquarters and two battalions went to Fort Logan, Colorado, and the Third Battalion went to Fort D. A. Russell, Wyoming. In March, 1904, this Battalion joined the remainder of the Regiment at Fort Logan.

The Regiment remained at Fort Logan for two and a half years, participating in the usual training duties. On February 10, 1906, it sailed from San Francisco for its second tour of duty in the Philippines. Its transport dropped anchor in Manila Bay on March 13, 1905.

By March 16, the entire Regiment was stationed at Camp Stotsenburg, Pampanga, at that time the largest camp in the Army. The Second remained under canvas until April 4, when it moved into the bamboo and nipa quarters provided.

On September 24, Headquarters, Band and Third Battalion, Second Infantry, proceeded by rail to Manila, then by transport to the Post of Zamboanga, Mindanao, arriving at the latter post September 28. On September 30, 1906, the First Battalion went to Jolo, Jolo, for station, arriving at the latter post October 3. On November 5, the Second Battalion followed and arrived at the Post of Jolo, Jolo, for station on November 9, going into camp at Asturias, 1,000 yards from the gate of the walled city, establishing a subpost and increasing the permanent garrison by that amount.

From its arrival in the Dopartment of Mindanao until the end of 1906, the Regiment romained in garrison, performing the usual garrison duties. On March 10, 1908, Headquarters, Band, Companies C, I, K and M left Zamboanga for Manila, en route to the United States, where they arrived, with Company L, which had joined them at Manila, on April 19, 1908. The remainder of the Regiment left Jolo on March 24 and reached San Francisco on May 8. The Third Battalion went to Fort Assinniboine, Montana, and the remainder of the Regiment to Fort Thomas, Kentucky.

For the next three years, the Second remained in these stations, performing the usual garrison duties and maintaining the high standard of training and preparedness for active service which had become a tradition.

In 1911, the Regiment was again due for foreign serving, being ordered to the Hawaiian Islands. The part of the Second Infantry at Fort Thomas left on March 21 and arrived at Honolulu on March 29, taking station at Schofield Barracks on the same date. The Third Battalion left Fort Russell on September 1 and upon arrival at Honolulu, took station at Fort Shafter. In January, 1913, Fort Shafter became the station of the entire Regiment.

Not long after the World War started, in 1914, German ships were making for neutral ports and being interned, owing to the superiority of the British Navy. As relations between the United States and Germany became acute, it was considered advisable to insure that these ships did not escape, and Army troops were placed aboard them. On February 3, 1917, Major William B. Cochran, with his battalion of the Second Infantry, was placed in charge of the German ships interned in Honolulu Harbor. Major Guy G. Palmer, with his battalion of the Regiment, became provost guard of Honolulu in March. Company I became guard of the immigration station at Honolulu on April 10. On May 2, this same Company was stationed on the transport which conveyed interned German sailors to San Francisco.

WORLD WAR PREPARATIONS

The Regiment was again assembled at Fort Shafter early in 1918, where intensive training preparatory to overseas service began. On June 28, the Regiment embarked at Honolulu and arrived at San Francisco on July 7, going to Camp Fremont, California, on the same date, to continue training for overseas duty. This phase of training continued until August 26, 1918, when the Regiment received orders to proceed to, and take station at, Camp Dodge, Iowa, where it arrived on September 1.

Shortly afterward, the Second was divided and one-half its men were transferred to the 88th Infantry. It was then made a part of the 19th Division. The period of intensive training which the Regiment had undergone at previous stations was but a beginning to the days which followed during September, October and November.

It was at Camp Dodge that the end of one of the greatest wars in history found the Second Infantry, the second oldest regiment in the Army of the United States, which had up to that time actively participated in every war that the United States had had, and which had been conspicuous in each one for its noble record and devotion.

In September, 1919, the First and Second Battalions, Second Infantry, were ordered to proceed to and take station at Camp Sherman, Ohio. On November 5, 1919, the remainder of the Regiment was ordered to the same station, arriving on November 7, 1919.

While on duty at the National Rifle Matches in 1921, the Regiment received orders that they were not to return to Camp Sherman. The Second Battalion going to Fort Sheridan, Illinois, and the Third Battalion to Fort Snelling, Minnesota. The Second Battalion arrived at Fort Sheridan, October 15. There they took station as "Training Center" troops, and as a training center unit the Second and Third Battalions were eliminated, leaving only the regimental headquarters and one battalion.

In August, 1922, the Second was redesignated a combat Regiment and the Second and Third Battalions reorganized, using as a nucleus personnel from the 54th Infantry. Regimental Headquarters and the First Battalion were stationed at Fort Sheridan, Second Battalion at Fort Wayne and the Third Battalion at Fort Brady.

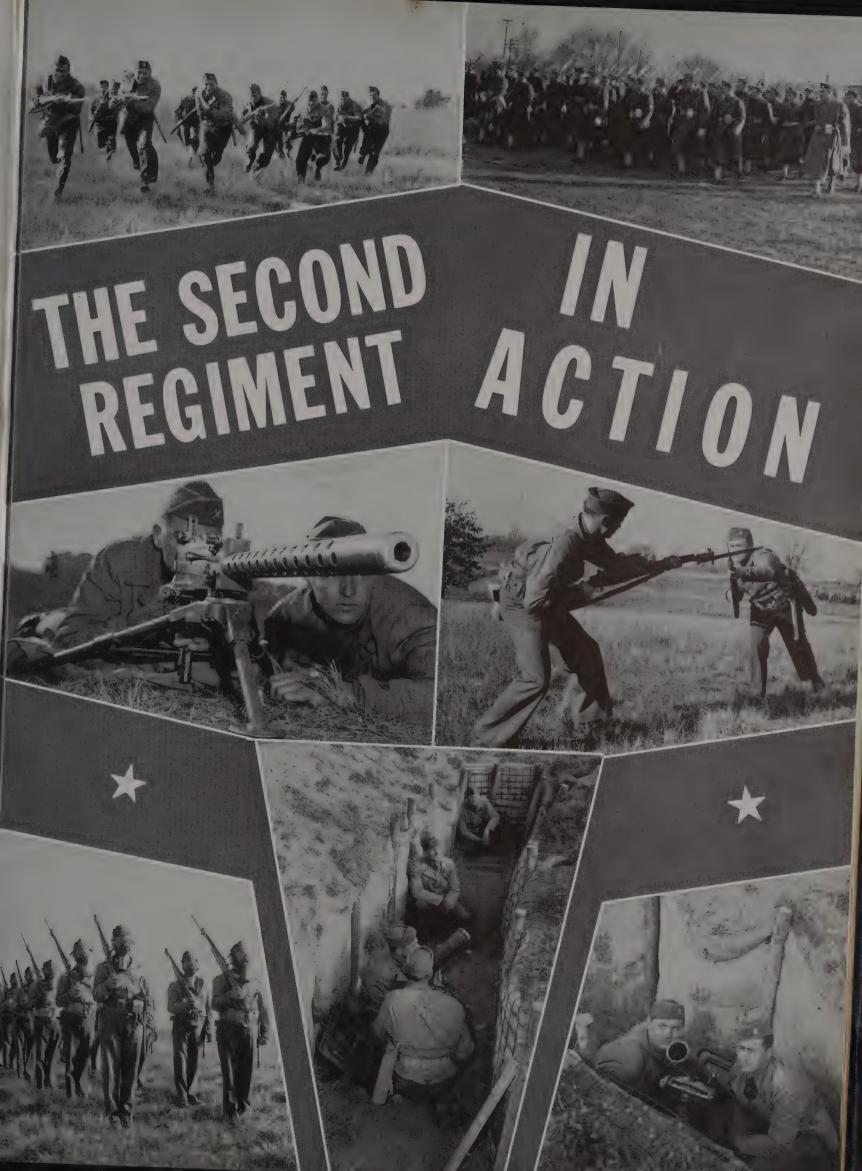

Since that time, there has been no major changes in the organization of the Regiment in regards to designations. During the past two decades, the Regiment has participated in the usual garrison training, maneuvers, field training and other duties.

The latest event in the history of the Regiment, which brings it up to date, was its assignment to the newly reactivated 5th Division on October 16, 1939. From Forts Wayne and Sheridan, the regiment's First and Second Battalions, moved to join the Division at Fort McClellan, Alabama, beginning on November 3, 1939. The Third Battalion was left at Fort Brady.

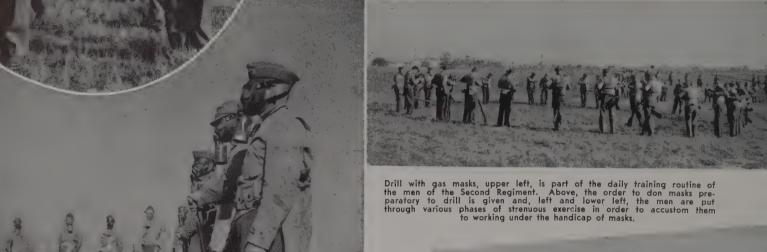

The Second Battalion, Second Infantry, was the first unit to occupy Fort Custer upon its being rebuilt in the fall of 1940. The First Battalion was transferred from Fort Sheridan to Fort Custer in January, 1941. The Third Battalion spent the winter months at Camp McCoy, Wisconsin, where it received winter warfare training, rejoining the Regiment at Fort Custer in March, 1941.

Besides intensive training at its home station, the Second Infantry, as part of the 5th Division, participated in the major maneuvers of 1940-1941.

The Second Infantry is maintaining its high standards of training and preparedness for active service which has become an honored tradition with the Regiment. Whenever the call comes, the Second will be ready.
